RESEARCH EMPHASIS

Exploring the process of re-localization, a pragmatic response to emerging biophysical limits and to the consequences of having disrupted the Earth's ecosystems. Applying conservation and environmental psychology principles to the envisioning of lives lived well within resource limits. Studying the connection between frugality and psychological well-being, motivating environmental stewardship using intrinsic satisfactions, and pre-familiarizing ourselves with a resource downshift.

TEACHING

Current teaching portfolio

Behavior and Environment (ENV 360, Psych 360, EAS 560, Urban and Regional Planning 544, Social Work 710)
Introduction to environmental psychology that examines human-environment interactions, builds an information-processing model of human nature, and uses it to understand what conditions bring out the best in people and maintain clarity and vitality

Psychology of Environmental Stewardship (ENV 361, Psych 362, EAS 561)
Explores research on the psychology of environmental stewardship, reviews behavior change models, creates a toolbox of approaches for promoting durable conservation behavior and develops a framework for conducting small experiments

Localization Seminar: Transitional Thinking for the New Normal (EAS 564 and ENV 484)
Examines the implications of an unprecedented downshift in energy and resource availability at the community level, envisions successful adaptation to such a future.
Integrative Research Seminar co-taught with Professor Princen

Conservation Behavior Seminar (EAS 661)
Advanced graduate seminar that examines current psychological research on promoting environmental stewardship and sustainable living

Reconnecting and Revitalizing (EAS 568)

Examines the embedded benefits of transitioning to a simpler pattern of living. Framed as an opportunity rather than an inevitable downshift it shows how people may decide to transition early because it is important and fulfilling. Co-taught with Professor Princen

Courses taught previously

Common Property Resource Management (Natural Resources 650)

Advanced graduate research seminar that examines the psychology, behavioral ecology and policy aspects of successful, long-term common property resource regimes. Co-taught with Professors Princen and Low

Junior Honors Seminar (Natural Resources 399 and Environment 399)

First course of the SNRE Honors program in which students prepare a proposal for their senior thesis projects. Course readings and discussions focus on research methods

Master's Project Planning Seminar (Natural Resources 701)

Graduate seminar in which research projects are initiated and developed by teams of students and a faculty advisor. Projects are conducted over three academic terms, involving student teams that produce a multi-authored research report
